Newly published figures show that there are more than 30 million Americans over the age of 65 and the number is growing. Much of that growth has been fueled by the rise of the Baby Boomer Generation. They are now the second-largest living generation in the United States. A recent study by the Urban Institute found that a record number of Baby Boomers are "heading toward independence" and that the majority of them want to live in communities that are affordable and provide good services, but that have a low crime rate. "As baby boomers age, they have a number of needs," says Charles Smith, a senior researcher at the Urban Institute and a co-author of the study. "They need a way to live that's affordable and that provides good services. They need a safe place to be." In that regard, it's worth pointing out that senior living communities are usually a sound investment if you can find one that is near enough to a hospital, grocery store and other amenities to make it easy to leave your home. On the other hand, if you're looking for a place that is too far away from a lot of these services, you may find yourself paying a lot more for housing. The other thing worth noting about aging baby boomers is that they have a high disposable income, which can make them especially attractive to some communities.
